"I learned a lot," said the then-chief engineer, "but I still had a lot to learn." In 1966, Ms. Wilkins recalled, Mr. Bartos worked on wiring in the machine-tool room, where the generation of electricity in the factory was a "nightmare," he said. "We lost two or three houses a year," he recalled. "We couldn't make electricity for cars, and a lot of things," he said. Mr. Bartos managed to make enough money for an initial investment of $5,000. By 1968, two years after moving to New York, he was saving $15,000 a year in interest, he said, and was ready to hire a manager to run the business. In September, the next year, he changed the name from In-T-R-E-M-A-L to Industrially Removable Machine Automation, or I.R.M.A. He had no illusions about the factory's future. "I'm no fool," he said. "I knew it was going to be a real problem." Within a year, however, Mr. Bartos was one of the area's hottest young developers. His early clients included the Radioshack Music Division of J.P. Stevens and Eastern of New 2d92ce491b
