That means you can ensure that you get the right product for you and your circumstances, and also ensure that you are not paying more than you need to. It's a common problem for many people. They start off by taking out a specific insurance policy with one company, and then switch to another company because they have a more attractive offer or are experiencing a claim. This can be an expensive mistake and it's something we frequently see with claims where customers have changed car insurance at a time when a policy with a different insurer had not been in place. Why should I keep my existing policy? in this situation, it's a good idea to stick with your existing insurance policy with the previous insurer. This is because if you change insurance at the same time as switching insurers, you can be left with gaps in your cover and not be able to make any claims. If you do not have a gap in cover with your existing insurer, it is important to note that you may also be at risk of receiving penalties when the time comes for your new policy to start.
